INFORMATION FOR YOUR SAFETY

FYS

Sweat is your body's built-in cooling system, but when sweat doesn't lower your core temperature enough, you're at risk for heat exhaustion and heat stroke, both of which can result in nausea, lethargy and even unconsciousness. Know how to cool down quickly to avoid the dangers of outdoor activity and strenuous exercise in hot conditions.

INFORMATION FOR YOUR SAFETY

FYS Thermostatic Mixing Valves

ANSI Z358.1 requires water used in emergency eyewashes and showers to be between 60°F and 100°F.

Thermostatic Mixing Valves (TMVs) help ensure the injured person is able to stay in position for the 15-minute time needed to flush off the contaminant from the eyes or body.

TMVs are available in standard and no-lead models and can be purchased separately and added to your current safety shower or eyewash, or purchased as a package with a new eyewash or shower.

It is important to match the appropriate TMV to the emergency equipment application. Your representative can assist you with sizing the correct TMV for your needs. They can also provide assistance with any other tempering requirements you may have.

The Haws AXION® MSR - Medically Superior Response® features ground-breaking technology engineered to create an inverted flow design that sweeps contaminants away from the vulnerable nasal cavity for maximum comfort.
